There is an implicit assumption in the field that proof skills are transferrable across content areas. Published research into proof and proving often discusses proof skills without restricting such discourse to the mathematical content of the respective study. This presentation will address study results that support the hypothesis that such skills exist and take preliminary steps towards classifying those skills. (Received September 15, 2014)