Communities that are ethnically or religiously split in half are fairly common worldwide. Such situations often set the stage for horrendous conflicts, such as are common even today in central Africa. We present a simple agent-based model that we argue gives insight into the formation of such conflicts, and suggests strategies for avoidance. (Received September 16, 2014)