

Permissions

You must obtain permission to use tables, photographs, cartoons, illustrations, or figures appearing in another scientific publication, or if you quote extensive passages from someone else's work. Obtaining permissions is your responsibility as the author, although the MAA staff is happy to advise you as to how to go about obtaining them. Production of your article will not begin until a final manuscript and all permissions have been received. If there is a cost for obtaining permission, it is the responsibility of the author to pay for the permissions. If the company from whom you obtained permission requests a copy of the issue, please inform the Editor of the journal. For more technical information on copyright issues, consult the Chicago Manual of Style, Sixteenth Edition, or visit the Copyright Office's website: www.copyright.gov.

Who do you contact to obtain permission?

Most authors transfer their rights to the publisher of the book or journal in which their article is published. When seeking to obtain permission to use material from an outside source, it is usually best to start with the publisher. However, if the material has not been published, or if the book or article indicates that the author holds the copyright, then contact the author.

Most US government publications will be in the public domain, and you will not need to obtain permission to use such material. Some works, however, are commissioned and carry a copyright notice. If such a copyright notice exists, you will have to seek the permission of the author.

What is included in a permission request? (Two sample letters follow)

Details about the material for which you seek permission:

1. The name and complete address of the publisher or author who holds the copyright.
2. A careful bibliographic identification of the material you want to use including the pages on which the material appears.

Details about your article:

1. Before granting permission, the publisher will require a description of your article, let them know what your article entails and how you propose to use the copyrighted material in the article you are writing. You may have to send a copy of your manuscript with your request.
2. The name and address of your publisher. When you say your article will be published in an MAA periodical by the Mathematical Association of America, please be sure to mention that the MAA is a nonprofit, educational organization and that your article will be distributed to members of the MAA, including educational institutions, teachers, students, and libraries.
3. The number of pages of your article.
4. The binding of MAA periodicals will always be paperbound.
5. All MAA journals are available both digitally and in print and are only available to members of the Mathematic Association of America as outlined in the membership benefits here, <http://www.maa.org/membership/membership-categories/maa-member-benefits>
The price of membership is outlined in the membership rates here, <http://www.maa.org/membership/membership-categories>
Individual journals cannot be purchased by non-members except special issues. It is important to note whether or not the issue in which your article appears is a special issue. Obviously, most articles are not in special issues and therefore are not available for individual purchase by non-members.

6. The last label run had 5628 print labels — that is individuals and libraries. We have almost 1000 libraries that get their current subscription to the journal electronically through JSTOR, some of those get both print and electronic so there is some overlap with the label run numbers.
7. The market is worldwide.
8. We will need electronic permission as well since our periodicals are also published online. If the publisher has a fee for electronic permission or print permission, it is the responsibility of the author to pay it.

Who is responsible for paying the fees associated with obtaining copyright permissions?

1. The author is responsible for paying the fees.
2. Please inform the Journal Editor if you also need to send a copy of the journal issue to the copyright holder.

When you have obtained all of the necessary permissions for your article, please send all documentation to the corresponding journal office.
